Students chant, fire department loses battle because of inadequate campus water supply

The weather forecast for the day was not promising. The wind was blowing, the sky was gray, and the temperature was low. It was the perfect conditions for a fire to spread quickly.

The fire started in the basement of Nichols Gym, and it quickly spread to the first floor. The fire department arrived on the scene, but by then it was too late. The building was engulfed in flames.

The fire department tried to bring the fire under control, but the inadequate water supply made it difficult. The water mains on campus were not up to standard, and the hydrants were not sufficient to provide the necessary amount of water.

As the fire grew, the crowd gathered outside the gym. They chanted, "Burn, baby, burn," and watched in horror as the flames consumed the building.

The fire department worked tirelessly to bring the fire under control, but the inadequacies in the water supply made their job difficult. In the end, the building was lost to the flames.

The aftermath was heartbreaking. The building, which had been a symbol of the college for many years, was nothing but a charred ruins.

The fire department was commended for their efforts, but it was clear that the inadequate water supply was the real cause of the loss.

The college took steps to improve the water supply, and in the years that followed, the adequacy of the system was improved. However, the memory of the 'Castle' fire remained etched in the minds of those who had witnessed it.
