Looking up from the basement of Nichols, steel beams stripe the sky. A wooden staircase on the second floor leads to the second floor, which is just above the basement. The remnants of a former space are visible, with the ceiling remaining intact. The contours of the staircase have been altered, with the wooden steps and Risers still intact. The view offers a perspective of the past, with the remains of a building still standing. Any thoughts on the history of this place are welcome.